

Dear FCC- Broadcasters want to limit competition and access to important information that can both be supplied by satellite radio. In addition, I am paying for that information. How can a competing group of companies(broadcasters) try to limit information that I am paying for?

What also should be obvious to broadcasters is they have cluttered their programming with over 16 minutes of non-music time per hour and each radio format restricts the play list available for the public to listen to. After listening to satellite radio, I rarely tune in to over the air because their product offering is inferior to satellite radio. XM is adding millions of paying listeners this year because they have given the public a choice in what we can listen to.

Just like cable tv which is a pay service, satellite radio should not be restricted by the FCC is what they offer their paying customers.

Paul Bowlin
4 Marc Lane
Westport, CT 06880
203-227-9329